In 2002, David Batstone traveled to Sudan to witness the effects of the country's long-running civil war. What he found was a country in ruins, where children were being abducted, enslaved, and killed. Batstone was so moved by what he saw that he decided to do something about it.

Batstone founded the organization Not For Sale, which works to combat child slavery in Sudan. Not For Sale provides food, shelter, and education to children who have been rescued from slavery. The organization also works to raise awareness of the issue of child slavery and to advocate for change.

Batstone's work in Sudan has been praised by many, including former President Jimmy Carter. Carter said, "David Batstone is a true hero. He has dedicated his life to fighting against the scourge of child slavery. His work has saved the lives of thousands of children."

The True Story Of One Man Battle To Save Children In The Sudan is a harrowing and inspiring account of Batstone's work in Sudan. The book is a must-read for anyone who cares about the plight of children in the developing world.
